

An Intolerable Deal: One Halfpennyworth of Mountain Tilman

H.W. "Bill" Tilman was a British mountaineer, explorer, and author who is considered one of the greatest adventurers of the 20th century. He was known for his pioneering expeditions to remote and challenging parts of the world, including the Himalayas, the Andes, and the Arctic. Tilman was also a prolific writer, and his books and articles are still widely read today.

In 1938, Tilman published a book entitled "An Intolerable Deal: One Halfpennyworth of Mountain." The book was a collection of essays about his experiences on some of his most challenging expeditions. The title of the book comes from a quote by the poet William Blake: "One halfpennyworth of bread to a loaf of bread, / One pennyworth of meat to a leg of mutton, / One farthingworth of vinegar to a hogshead." Tilman used this quote to illustrate his belief that the rewards of mountaineering are not material, but rather spiritual.

In this article, we will explore the meaning of Tilman's book and discuss some of the key themes that emerge from his writing. We will also consider Tilman's legacy as a mountaineer and explorer.

The title of Tilman's book, "An Intolerable Deal," is a reference to the fact that mountaineering is often a difficult and dangerous undertaking. Tilman himself was no stranger to hardship and danger. He was involved in several serious accidents during his climbing career, and he lost several friends to the mountains.

Despite the risks involved, Tilman believed that mountaineering was worth the effort. He wrote, "The mountains are there, and they are a challenge to our courage, our endurance, and our skill. To meet that challenge is to experience one of the most profound and rewarding adventures that life has to offer."

Tilman's book is not a guide to mountaineering. It is not a manual on how to climb mountains safely or efficiently. Rather, it is a meditation on the meaning of mountaineering. Tilman explores the philosophical and spiritual aspects of mountaineering, and he argues that the mountains can teach us important lessons about ourselves and about the world around us.

There are several key themes that emerge from Tilman's writing in "An Intolerable Deal." These themes include:

- The importance of challenge: Tilman believed that challenge is essential for human growth and development. He wrote, "We do not grow when things are easy. We grow when we are challenged, when we are pushed to our limits."

- The value of solitude: Tilman was a solitary figure. He preferred to climb alone, and he often sought out remote and unclimbed peaks. He believed that solitude can be a source of great strength and inspiration.
- The beauty of the natural world: Tilman was a passionate lover of the natural world. He wrote, "The mountains are a place of great beauty, and they have the power to inspire and uplift us."
- The importance of friendship: Tilman lost several friends to the mountains, but he also made many lifelong friends through his climbing. He believed that friendship is essential for a happy and fulfilling life.
